Drew the $10,000 Prize.

Shifra, the wife of Adolph Kohn, of No. 28 Orchard street, was about nine years ago a cook in a family in Yassi, Roumania. That section of Europe is overrun with lotteries.

One day, according to Shifra's story, she succumbed to the honeyed words of a lottery agent, who regularly visited her village, and invested the greater part of her month's wages in a ticket which gave her one chance out of a million or more of winning the capital prize of 50,000 francs. But when her mistress told her of the seght chance she ran of winning such a prize, Shifra bewailed her precipitancy in having invested so much of her hardearned money in such a game. When her mistress offered to buy the ticket from her she gladly accepted. Adolph Kohn was engaged to be mar ried to Shifra's mistress. She had told him about Shifra's purchase of the lot-

Then, in the village inn, he happened upon his friend, the lottery agent, who had sold Shifra the ticket. The agent confided to Kohn tha prize of 50,000 france. He immediatly decided that the servant maid with a power of 50,000 francs ($10,000) would be a better wife for him than her mis-

Poor Shifra was won by the unexpected attentions which young Kohn paid her. The courtship was short, even for that country, and within a few hours Shifra had become the wife of her mistress's quondam lover.

Once more chance played the winning hand in this little game. Shifra's mis tress had neglected to tell Kohn that she had bought the lottery ticket from

On the night of the wedding Kohn asked Shifra about the lottery ticket. structions to condemn the deserters and He could have strangled ber when she told him that she had sold the slip. Neither Shifrs nor her mistress knew that the ticket had drawn the capital prize. But the next day the lottery agent announced the good news.

Now to the grief Adolph suffered at the loss of the girl he really loved and the money for which he jilted her were added the sneering jibes of his friends in the village. He could not stand this humiliation and soon left Yassi to come Mrs. Kohn came to this city last July been shot in a day, but they come in from surrounding uncultivated regions to feast on the grain fields in increasing numbers. It is estimated that three jack rabbits will eat as much grain as one sheep. A big drive was held in February and many thousands of rabbits were killed, but a month later it was estimated there were 100,000 on the same ground. Another drive was held the first of April, but already the rab-
